Wednesday, March 2. 1720.

Warsaw, February 23.

ON the 31st of January, the Staroſta Zakroczynsky urged, that the reſtoring of the Great Generals of the Crown and of the Great Dutchy, was a Point ſo neceſſary for the Welfare of their Conſtitution, that unleſs the Court complied with the Deſire of the Houſe in a Matter ſo often inſiſted upon, he would put a Stop to all their Proceedings by his Proteſtation. M. Kachonowsky, another Member of the Lower-Houſe, replied, that this Matter having already been determined in the late Pacification at Warſaw, ought the leſs to be revived at the preſent Juncture, becauſe the ſaid Generals had then conſented to that Limitation of their Command: Beſides that in former Times the Kings of Poland had always been at Liberty to confer on ſuch Perſons as they thought fit, the Command of the Forces which were upon a Foreign Eſtabliſhment; which he proved by an Inſtance in the Reign of King Stephen Batori: But upon this one of the Deputies inſinuated, what would be the Conſequence of leaving the Command of part of the Troops in the Hands of Count Flemming, by ſetting forth, that in Caſe of an Interregnum after his preſent Majeſty's Demiſe, the Great Generals of the Republick being obliged by the Fundamental Laws to keep away from the Diet of Election, the General who had the Command of a ſeparate Body of Forces, would have the beſt Opportunity of approaching and influencing the Election.

On the 1ſt of February, the Emperour's Letter to the Republick was read in the Houſe: It contained a Notification of the Electoral Prince's Marriage with the Archdutcheſs Daughter of the Emperour Joſeph, and of the renewing of the Treaty of Alliance between the Houſe of Auſtria and the Republick; after which the Emperour deſires the Diet to give Credit to whatever Count Kinigſegg, his Ambaſſadour, ſhould propoſe on his part, and to return an Anſwer to his Propoſals. The Affair of the Command of the Army was again in Agitation, and after very great Debates which laſted till 8 in the Evening, the Marſhal went to wait on the King, to repreſent to his Majeſty, with what Eagerneſs moſt of the Deputies inſiſted on putting the Command of the whole Army into the Hands of the two Generals. The King returned for Anſwer, that the ſaid Generals ought to make out their Pretenſions before the Throne, when both Houſes ſhould be joined, but moſt of the Deputies thinking this Anſwer not ſatisfactory, above 20 of them proteſted and went out, which obliged the Marſhal to adjourn the Houſe to the 3d Inſtant.

On the 3d Inſtant, the Houſe came to a Reſolution, not to recede from their Point of having the Generals reſtored to their former Command.

On the 5th, one of the Members propoſed a Conjunction with the Senate, in order to deſire his Majeſty to put the Command of the whole Army into the Hands of the two Generals, which Motion was again oppoſed by M. Kachonowsky. The Marſhal afterwards communicated to the Houſe the King's Anſwer in writing to their Addreſs, expreſſing his Majeſty's Diſſatisfaction to hear ſuch a Difficulty ſtarted about the Command of the Army, which might occaſion a Difference between his Majeſty and the Nobility, at the Time when his Majeſty had taken proper Meaſures for the Security of the Kingdom by ſending an Embaſſy to Petersbourg; aſſuring them that his Majeſty was ready to let the Generals have due Satisfaction in caſe they would apply in a proper Method. Hereupon moſt of the Deputies roſe up and offered to go out of the Houſe, but this was prevented by an Incident, which was the taking Leave of two of their Body, who were the Sewer of Lithuania, and the Enſign of Rawa, whom his Majeſty had called up to the Senate.

On the 6th, the Houſe was taken up with reclaiming the Deputy of Orzan, who was gone away the Day before, proteſting againſt the putting off ſo long the Conjunction with the Senate.

On the 7th, the Marſhal put the Queſtion to the Aſſembly, whether they were reſolved to joyn with the Senate; but then the Command of the Generals was moved again, and others inſiſted, that ſuch of the Members as were guilty of a Colluſion with Prince Dolhorucki ought to be impeached; and ſo nothing was reſolved.

The 8th and 9th, the Members held only private Conferences, moſt of their Aſſembly refuſing to continue the Seſſions, or to joyn with the Senate before the Generals were reſtored to their former Command.

On the 10th, the Conjunction with the Senate happened unexpectedly. The Marſhal requeſted the King in the Name of the Lower Houſe, 1. That they might have Liberty to aſſemble in their own Houſe on any extraordinary Emergency in caſe the Diet ſhould be prorogued. 2. That they might hold their Provincial Diets; and 3. That his Majeſty would be pleaſed to reſtore the Generals to their former Command. The firſt and ſecond Points were granted, but as to the third, his Majeſty anſwered, that he would ſo far comply with their Deſire, as to take from Count Flemming the Command allowed to him by Vertue of the Pacification of Warſaw, but without putting it into the Hands of the Republick's Generals, but command the Army himſelf, and take Care to prevent the Exactions committed upon the poor Subjects by their own and Foreign Forces. But the Deputies of the Lower-Houſe not having found it ſatisfactory, his Majeſty prorogued the Diet to the 17th; during which time, the Senators and Members were diverted at Court with Balls and other Carnival Diverſions; and on the 14th, the Provincial Seſſions of Great and Leſſer Poland and Lithuania were opened.

On the 17th, the Court Treaſurer of Poland endeavoured to diſpoſe the Lower Houſe to deſiſt from their Pretenſions as to the Command of the Generals of the Crown and Lithuania. He repreſented to them, that their Demand was an Encroachment upon the Prerogatives of the Crown; that Count Flemming deſerved Favour of the Nation for having delivered it of the Ruſſian Forces, and for having renewed the Alliance with the Court of Vienna, relying on the Approbation of the Republick, to whoſe Ratification that Treaty was referred. But theſe Motives were not able to prevail with the Majority of the Deputies, who by their Proteſtations at length put an entire Stop to all further Proceedings.

On the 19th, the Marſhal acquainted the Houſe, that his Majeſty being greatly concerned to ſee the Diet thus broke off at ſo nice a Juncture, propoſed to them in the firſt Place, the enacting of a new Law relating to the Command of the Great Generals, with a Salvo for the Royal Prerogative, the Rights of the Republick, and the Diſpoſition made at the Pacification of Warſaw; and in the ſecond Place that a Conference be held between the Primate of the Kingdom, aſſiſted by the Miniſtry of the Court, and a Committee of their Houſe, for accommodating all other Differences about the Conſtitution of the Government. But this Offer was rejected, and the Deputies inſiſted that the Marſhal ſhould take Leave of his Majeſty in their Name.

On the 20th, in a full Aſſembly, the Primate made a Speech, in which he expreſſed his Grief to ſee their Conſultations for the publick Good interrupted; he thanked the King for having ſeveral times prolonged the preſent Seſſion, and deſired his Majeſty to reſtore the Generals of the Republick to their former Authority. But the King declared, that he would maintain the Pacification of Warſaw in its full Force.

On the 21ſt, the Marſhal made the ſame Requeſt to the King, but his Majeſty perſiſted in his Reſolution, and the Chancellour of the Crown declared, that the Security of his Majeſty's Perſon would not admit of any Compliance in that Point.

On the 23d the Marſhal took Leave of his Majeſty, recommending in a pathetick Speech to his paternal Care the Intereſts of the Kingdom. He was anſwered by the Under Chancellour of the Crown, who ſaid, that neither the Treaty of Vienna, nor Count Flemming's Command, were the true Occaſions of the ill Succeſs of their Deliberations, but that it ought to be aſcribed to the Practices of ill-affected Perſons; he ended with aſſuring the States, that his Majeſty would take all poſſible Care for protecting the Republick againſt any Danger. After which the Deputies were admitted to kiſs the King's Hand, and ſo the Diet was diſſolved.
